Who's Who in the Oughtred Society ..... David D. McFarland, Professor Emeritus of Sociology, UCLA, and a Fellow of the Oughtred Society, writes: My recent research and publications concern pre-electronic computing devices and techniques. My collection focuses on these, but also includes historic means of getting mathematical symbols and other non-standard characters onto paper or other writing surfaces. Lois, my wife, has been quite supportive. It was she who suggested that I get my old slide rules out where they could be seen by our guests, rather than taking up valuable closet space. She also donated several items, including her then-retired Versalog, an early computer mouse prototype, and a mechanical adding machine that had been owned by her grandfather. At UCLA I taught mathematical sociology and demography, social stratification, and statistical methods. I also offered a seminar "Slide Rules, Punch Cards, and Relatives: How Computing Used to Be Done". I am now retired but still teach a bit, as in the photo of me showing my grandson Griffin how to multiply on a slide rule.
